TIN BADGES OF THE RAILS

THROUGH narrowed eyes the thief scrutinized the passengers filtering from the express through the gate onto the railroad station. Finally his choice lay before a portly well-dressed man, followed by a portly bearing two bulging valises. He followed them carefully to the cigar stand, where the man tipped the porter as he set down the suitcases. While the man turned his attention to selecting some cigars the thief carefully slipped up behind, snatched the two pieces of luggage, and quickly hid him self in the lobby.

As he hurried to the subway entrance glancing nervously over his shoulder to see if he was being pursued, he suddenly came to a dead halt as he felt a heavy hand drop on his shoulder and a voice growl: "Stop, where you are wanted! You is under arrest!"

It was useless to claim the valises as his own or plead ignorance or act in disgust. He knew that the cop was right, that he'd been caught red-handed! Instantly on his hands stretched the stolen valises. The criminal delinquents were men in the wings of luggage stevedores. The system, which even here tries to mimic the efficiency of business Puritanism, delinquents keep a wary eye for easily looking nervous strangers carrying luggage that was beyond their means to the street or subway.

What an odd the luggage-thief had imagined he had escaped! Nothing more than what the nearest purveyor would have given him for the bag and its contents. That is why he always worked close. There wouldn't have been enough profit to split with any accomplice if his plan succeeded.

But working for luggage Garton is only one of the many duties of these plainclothesmen who make up the Protective Division of the Association of American Railroads. Along by all sorts of petty crime—these station detectives decidedly reward their slavery by mingling with passengers on the platform, loitering or waiting up and strolling through the station. Some are stationed at lockers, which provide good vantage points to observe the crowds below. These men are rotated every half hour to avoid suspicion.

Like other policemen they are not confined to indoor work exclusively. These loyal sentries in the length of the rails. They patrolled the yards to safeguard the cargoes of the locomotives from fire, and road watching junks. They are present at disasters. When a train, recently, was derailed and derailed no one, furthermore, detectives added a pair of dogs who tried to find the stricken passengers.

They cooperate with Secret Service men who keep the President under close surveillance when he is abroad or here. They inspect and help guard valuable shipments. Not long ago, when a carriage soldier slipped through the door of a steel car, which had just been loaded with gold bullion destined for Ft. Knox, he was surprised to see a man lunge at him, a menacing pistol in his hand.

"What are you? What are you doing in here?" snapped the stranger.

"I am one of the soldiers assigned to guard this car. I just wanted to see what a fellow looks in gold bullion like that!" said the soldier, when he managed to catch his breath.

"Okay, son. You can't a nightman here. Now get back to your post, outside, and fix that."

"No, I'm not—and you identify your self!"

Whereupon the man displayed his badge: "I'm a railroad detective, and I'm warning you that you all gold could we reach the end of the rails— Ft. Knox!"

Truly the railroad detective is the 19th century's knight of the road.
